Ten objections almost everyone in sales hears

Every answer follows the same formula: first acknowledge what is fair about the objection, then find the real reason with an open question. Never push, never defend the price.

1 “Thanks, not interested.“

A protective reflex: someone called out of the blue fends it off in order to stay free.

> I understand, you were not expecting my call. One quick question about you, then I will leave you in peace straight away: How do you handle this today, and what about it would you like to be simpler?

Short: Understood. May I ask one question before I hang up?

---

2 “I do not have time right now.“

They are protecting their time, and the topic has no urgency for them yet.

> No problem, then I will not hold you up. When suits you better for 15 minutes: tomorrow morning or Thursday afternoon?

---

3 “Just send me something.“

A polite way out so they do not have to say no.

> Gladly. So that I do not send you anything unnecessary: Which information would be especially relevant for your decision?

4 “We already have a provider for that.“

They have committed themselves and do not want to question their decision.

> That is good, then you have already taken care of this and know what matters. If you could change one thing about your current solution, what would it be?

---

5 “That is too expensive for us right now.“

The price stands alone for them, without a comparison.

> I understand, and good that you look closely at the costs. When you say too expensive: compared with which alternative?

Short: Too expensive compared to what?

6 “We have no budget for that.“

Budget follows urgency.

> I understand, that is a fair point. Is the budget for this year fully allocated, or is the topic simply not on your list yet?

7 “I can get that cheaper elsewhere.“

They have a comparison price in mind and are checking whether you are worth yours.

> Good that you compare, I would do the same. Apart from price, what matters most to you in the decision? Then we can see whether the other offer covers that just as well.

Short: What exactly is included there? Then we will compare it honestly.

8 “I need to discuss this with my business partner first.“

They have to answer to others and do not want to own a mistake alone.

> That makes sense, a decision like that is not made alone. Where do you stand yourself: Would you recommend it? And what will be the most important question for your partner?

9 “I need to think it over again.“

Fear of the wrong decision.

> Of course, it has to be right for you. What are the points you would still like to think about?

10 “Call again in a few months.“

Putting it off feels safer than deciding.

> Happy to, you obviously have more important things on your plate right now. So that I call at the right moment: What will have changed for you by then?
